EXPLORE THE HISTORY OF HOBART

Hobart's historical past is a young heritage, just over 200 years compared to the history of other countries and cities in the world. We are in such a capable position to record it for the future.

Our Association encourages members to do their family research, record family stories, collect photos, letters, personal items and diaries to preserve them as your legacy for the future.

Hunter Island, Sullivan's Cove 1804 (George Prideaux Harris)

THE FIRST DAY

February 20, 1804

That Monday morning was squally and wet, but during the afternoon the weather cleared enough for a body of prisoners to be landed to clear the scrub for the campsite. Amongst the scrub were towering eucalyptus trees making things more difficult. Under the supervision of Lt. Edward Lord, the convicts pitched the tents on the selected site.

The free settlers were off-loaded into longboats and taken up river to Stainsforth Bay and were seemingly unceremoniously dumped.

At 4pm Lt.-Governor Collins, with his officers, stepped ashore for a short time to see how things were progressing. A plan of the new settlement was soon drawn up.

That night the marines and convicts slept in their designated areas at the new camp. They were the first Europeans to sleep on the site of the future capital of Tasmania.
